The problem with these wire-tapping bills is simple. There is not enough regulation / over-sight attached to these laws/bills being proposed. That and the potential for misuse by individuals for private purposes is too great. Has anyone at the FCC watched the movie "Enemy of the State"? The concerns are real. This movie, while fictional, brings the problem into perfect clarity. The movie also probably falls well short of what can happen with intelligence agencies TODAY, with what they currently have, let alone freeing them to use new means to do their work.

Without proper oversight that is clearly set forth in the documents (which every time I have seen one of these propositions has been completely lacking, or even not documented at all), these should never be put forward.

Thank you,

Theodore B. Summers